

Study Reveals Customer Satisfaction Expands Dramatically When Companies Place Consumer Needs Ahead of Immediate Business and Marketing Goals

Customers are 269 percent more likely to be satisfied when they view a company's marketing as putting their needs ahead of its business goals, according to MarketingSherpa survey of 2,400 U.S. consumers

JACKSONVILLE, Fla., Dec. 12, 2016 /PRNewswire/ -- Companies practicing true "customer-first marketing" have a lot to gain based on the results of a new online survey conducted by MarketingSherpa (www.marketingsherpa.com).

The findings indicate that nearly 60 percent of highly satisfied customers believe that the marketing of a company they were satisfied with "often or always" puts their needs ahead of its own business goals compared to 16.1 percent of highly unsatisfied customers — a relative difference of 269 percent. Similarly, for companies perceived as prioritizing customer needs against their own business goals, the satisfaction relative difference jumps to 488 percent.

The MarketingSherpa Customer-first Marketing survey of 2,400 consumers, sampled to reflect a close match to the U.S. population's demographics, was conducted in September and October 2016. Half of the respondents (1,200) were asked to reflect on their experiences with a brand with which they are highly satisfied, and the other half (1,200) were questioned about a brand with which they are not satisfied. The responses of these two groups were then compared and contrasted against each other. The respondents from each age group, the Silent Generation (71-93); Baby Boomers (52-70); Generation Xers (34-51); and Millennials (18-35); were nearly evenly split between the paired surveys.

The satisfaction chasm, not surprisingly, seems to translate into sales. Nearly 92 percent of satisfied consumers indicate they are likely or very likely to continue to purchase from brands they like versus 29.4 percent who are unsatisfied with a brand.

"In this era of data-driven marketing and intense customer targeting, the survey results clearly indicate that brands should think beyond just aiming at their customer, and instead use that data to elevate the customer. We call this customer-first marketing," said Daniel Burstein, senior director of Editorial Content, MarketingSherpa. "If the customer is the king or queen, shouldn't they come first?"

"By using marketing to serve customers and prioritizing customer needs before short-term business and marketing objectives, companies will gain a long-term competitive advantage and sustainable business success as indicated by the increases in purchase intent and loyalty we measured in the study."

Customer-first Marketing Is Important to Consumers

Additional data points from the survey include:

- More than half of all respondents (56 percent) indicated that customer-first marketing was either important or very important to them.
- Only 8 percent of highly unsatisfied customers were very likely to continue purchasing — a 713 percent relative difference.
- Half (51 percent) of highly satisfied customers were very likely to give the company a chance to correct its mistake by contacting customer service to find a resolution while only 18 percent of highly unsatisfied customers said the same
- These same satisfied customers are more likely to recommend a company to others (61 percent very likely and 30 percent likely).

"Having worked in this industry for many years, I know most marketers want to practice customer-first marketing when they wake up in the morning and look in the mirror," said Burstein. "So we wanted to provide the data and insights to inspire these marketers."

"Because, in the real world, this practice is exceedingly difficult. It requires marketers to view decisions through a holistic, long-term lens while immediate, short-term challenges are screaming for their attention every day. However, according to their customers, it is not impossible. Only 8 percent of Americans have never experienced customer-first marketing. And there is still a large opportunity; just 23 percent of respondents said the marketing of many or almost all companies is customer-first."

Traditional Marketing Remains the Preferred Channel of Customer Engagement

In addition to questions about customers' overall views of a brand's business and marketing practices, MarketingSherpa also wanted to discover customers' channel preferences and how their satisfaction impacted these preferences. When asked about engaging with each of the brand's marketing channels, 52 percent of satisfied customers often or always engaged with TV ads, followed closely by emails at 50 percent. Print ads by mail (direct mail), from the store (in-store circulars) and in magazines were consumed by 50 percent, 48 percent and 45 percent, respectively.

While unsatisfied customers ranked channels in a similar order, they were much less likely to want to engage with the brands they were unsatisfied with. Only 29 percent often or always watched TV ads; just 28 percent read print ads from mail (direct mail); only 27 percent read print ads in a newspaper, magazine, or from a store (in-store circulars); and just 23 percent wanted to subscribe to email.

"The satisfied customers produced by customer-first marketing and business practices are so vital to marketers because satisfied customers are more likely to engage and less likely to disengage across a range of channels," Burstein said. "Following best practices or investing in the right channels is not enough, if their companies don't practice customer-first marketing and business practices, marketers' channel investments will underperform. This justifies giving marketers a seat at the table of key business and marketing decisions to serve as an advocate for the audience."
